

MINING: Group expected to make a recommendation next week

mining in Virginia.”
That power, he pointed out, goes to the state, since the General Assembly created Buckingham, just as its members voted to create every county in the Commonwealth.

WHEN CAN THEY REGULATE?
Now yes, cities and counties can regulate mining. In Article 7, Section 15.2-2280, the Virginia Code says that any city or county can “regulate, restrict, permit, prohibit and determine” what to do in four situations. The fourth is very clearly identified as “the excavation or mining of soil or other natural resources.”

But it's how this happens officials have to be careful about. While a county like Buckingham can't just outright ban the concept, they can restrict what is and isn't allowed through zoning ordinances.

Wright's comments echoed what Joe Lerch told the state gold mining workgroup back in September. Lerch, who serves as director of local government policy for the Virginia Association of Counties, explained last September that counties can decide what is and isn't allowed in zoning.

“In a zoning ordinance, you can say that this is not allowed activity,” Lerch told the group. “Or you could say it is allowed in (a certain) type of district, like an industrial district, with a special use permit. If you want to say we don't even want to consider it, that could be in your ordinance too.”

WHY HAVE THIS DEBATE?

So why is this debate happening in Buckingham County? It stems from a situation that started more than two years ago. In April 2019, the Canadian prospecting company Aston Bay Holdings announced they were beginning to search for gold in Buckingham.

To be clear, Aston Bay isn't a mining company. It's a prospecting company. That means they search for gold, silver or other minerals, identify and purchase a location, then sell that information (and property) to the highest bidder. They can do this because under Virginia law, prospecting doesn't require a state permit if you're searching for anything other than uranium. In statements given in March 2019 and July 2020, company officials declared their drilling confirmed a “high-grade, at-surface gold vein system at Buckingham, as well as an adjacent wider zone of lower-grade disseminated gold mineralization.”

In other words, they found enough to keep going. At the beginning of 2020, the company secured the right to prospect on 4,953 acres of land in Buckingham County.

Just don't expect a gold mine to spring up anytime soon or even a request to build one. In an interview earlier this year with The Herald, Aston Bay CEO Thomas Ulrich said the company was “still in the early stages of exploration.”

“We have conducted only preliminary exploratory drilling on the local landowners' properties at Buckingham, and none for the past two years,” Ulrich said. “We have several quality potential projects, but a limited amount of funds. Over

WHAT HAPPENS NOW?

So, now what? Well, the planning commission has a decision to make.

“At the end of next week's regular meeting, we can decide if we need to hear other speakers,” said Planning Commission Chairman John Bickford. “Our next step would be to do that and decide on a work session.”

That next meeting is set for Monday, May 22, beginning at 7 p.m.
